An important new global study says that if we include physical activity in our everyday lives, we will be healthier and live longer than if we just go to the gym. It compared 130,000 people in 17 countries, from rich countries like Canada and Sweden to some of the poorest, including Bangladesh and Zimbabwe. The author of the study, Professor Scott Lear recommends 30 minutes of exercise per day for five days a week, but one to two hours a day is the ideal amount of activity. Most people think they cannot include that much activity in their life, he said. "They think 'I'm stressed out and have to make dinner – and then do exercise for two hours!'" he said. But the study showed that those people who have the highest activity levels are the people who are active in their everyday working lives. Doing housework is better than occasionally going to the gym or swimming pool. "Sitting for hours is not good for hearts or the physical body," he said. "Getting up every 20 to 30 minutes for a walk around is good for you." He also suggests playing with children in the park rather than just watching them, increasing the walk to work by getting off the underground or bus one stop early and taking the stairs rather than the lift.

Task A: Circle T for True and F for False
